

Working with recruiters

This list contains a mix of search, selection and database recruiters so there may be companies on the list who operate either above or below your salary expectations.

Therefore, before contacting a recruiter, you should always do some additional research:

- Take some time to make sure that the recruiter handles appointments of the type you require, and at the level you require. You can do this by visiting the websites, and viewing the company profile provided.
- If the website contains live jobs, or examples of completed assignments, look at these and see if they are the sort of roles you are interested in and suited for. Are you the type of person they would be interested to hear from?
- If you decide that a recruiter is a good match for you, see if you can find the contact name of the consultant handling relevant appointments. Very often there is a profile of the consultants, their experience and recruiting specialisms.

For each recruiter we have provided the telephone number, general enquiry email and web address. However, you should always check the website to see if there are specific email addresses for different regional offices or for industry or functional practices within the company.

If you earn above £80,000 per year, you should also review the list of the top headhunters, and contact the relevant industry or functional practice. The list is available on our website.
